Purpose and Scope of the Course

“Knowledge of self is acquired through the knowledge of others”

This course covers the vast region of Latin America, as it increasingly becomes a globally prominent region. Most of the countries in Latin America have achieved successful transitions to democracy and are in fact consolidating their democracies. The region hosts some of the most competitive and dynamic economies in the world such as Brazil (among the Top 10 largest economies in the world), Mexico and Chile. Latin American countries have been leading the global campaign towards more just, equitable, democratic and transparent regimes through a vast array of grass roots social movements.

Throughout this semester, we will trace the development and democratization trends in the region from early colonial period to the current era. After the initial thematic sections, we will look at individual countries. With its more than 550 million population, Latin America offers a rather diverse set of experiences. Specifically, we will look at Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Cuba, and Venezuela.

We like it or not, globalization impacts all of our lives. It is an important skill to understand the world, rather than be afraid of the unknown. Moreover, the Hispanic vote makes significant impact in the US elections, and the US has ever increasing economic, political, social and cultural ties with the region. Latin American Politics should be a useful point of departure, if you are interested in political science, global affairs, and the issues of democracy and economic development in the world.

Course Goals

- Learning the fundamentals of Latin American political structures, from Colonial period to the modern era.
- Understanding the common historical-institutional trends within the region, as well as the structural forces that cause significant variation.
- Developing a solid and critical understanding of the US engagement in Latin America, and how it changed over time.
- Applying the course material to current political developments in the region, with particular focus on Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Cuba, and Venezuela.
- Being able to critically analyze the increasing global power and visibility of the region.
