Course Description

This is a graduate seminar focusing on the evolution of military strategy with the ebb and flow of state, society and technology. Departing from Clausewitz's oft-quoted maxim: "War is ... a continuation of political activity by other means," the seminar seeks to explore and emphasize the primacy of politics in determining the military strategy. During the course, students will be introduced to and familiarized with, the succession of land, naval and air power strategies as well as nuclear strategy. Although majority of cases covered in the course reflects the primacy of states for strategic studies, supranational and non-state actors' challenges to Clauswitzian conception of strategy, such as the European Defence Policy or international terrorist networks will merit particular attention. This course requires active student participation, including presentation of reviewed books to the class. The learning outcomes include developing familiarity with strategic ideas and understanding the link between politics and strategy.
